

IRONQUOIS STRANDED OFF HEAVY SHOALS

Sister Liners Wait for Sea to Abate Before Removing Her.

VESSEL CARRIES 100 PASSENGERS

Tugs Rushed to Relief to Tow
Ship to a Port for Repairs.

NEW YORK, Dec. 23.—The latest advice received here today by the United Wireless Company is that the Clyde liner Ironquois, minus her rudder, is still anchored thirteen miles off the Frying Pan shoals, on the North Carolina coast, and that her sister liners, San Marcos and Mohawk, are waiting for the sea to abate before passing her and towing her to Charleston, S. C., for repairs. It is hardly probable that the Ironquois' passengers will be taken off the disabled coast liner, but will remain on board until she is towed into Charleston.

The Ironquois carries 100 passengers and a large crew. She sailed from New York Saturday for South Carolina and Florida ports. The liner encountered heavy seas all the way down the coast, and when off the Carolina coast her rudder was swept away by a giant sea. She immediately anchored. As the seas were heavy her captain gave up trying to steer by the alternate use of his screws.

Wireless "S O S" messages, which have replaced the famous "C Q D," were immediately flashed out and received by half a dozen ships in the immediate vicinity and by the land stations all along the coast. The liner San Marcos, of the same line, ranged up alongside the Ironquois within a very short time after the accident and ran a hawser to the rudderless ship. The seas were running so high, however, that when the San Marcos undertook to get under way with her to water line she parted effort and was driven another futile. The Ironquois then anchored, with the San Marcos close alongside, to make the attempt again as soon as the seas died down. During the night the Mohawk, attracted by the wireless calls, came along and remained to be of any assistance. The two ships received wireless orders from New York to remain with the Ironquois and tow her to Charleston for repairs.

NEW YORK, Dec. 23.—Andrew Carnegie is resting comfortably today at his Fifth avenue mansion, after his injury yesterday in Central Park, when he slipped on the ice and badly hurt his left knee. The "Steel King" is still in bed, his doctors say that no permanent disability will result.

Dr. Garman today issued the following statement regarding Carnegie's condition: "Although it causes him much pain, the injury to Andrew Carnegie's leg is not serious. It will keep him indoors for a week or so, but he will not be confined to his bed long." Mr. Carnegie was unable to rise after he fell and had to be assisted to his feet by park employees. The accident occurred not far from Carnegie's home, and the men who went to the injured man's aid made a "saddle" of their hands, in the old-fashioned way, and carried him to his home. They refused to give their names when Carnegie requested this information.
